

When dining halls are closed, many college students struggle to find good snack options, unable to afford the overpriced upcharge of convenience stores and vending machines.

Dining halls offer highly convenient options for students to get quality food for most of the day. However, once they close at 9pm, it can be rather difficult to find solid options for food. Late night snacks can be really important, especially in the night-owl life of a college student. Fuel for late studying and extracurriculars can be crucial to success. However, the primary available options are upcharged vendors like convenience stores and vending machines. These high-priced foods are not feasible for many students.
